

In a beautiful forest, the little animals went to the Forest School. Among them were a Rabbit and a Turtle.

The Rabbit was clever and often scored the highest marks. Because of this, he sometimes thought: "I am the smartest animal in the school!" He did not listen much to others and was not always friendly.

The Turtle, however, was kind, humble, and helpful. She believed that true education means not only learning lessons, but also becoming loving, honest, and respectful. She often helped smaller animals with their schoolwork and always spoke kindly.

One day, the Squirrel Teacher asked the class: "What is true education?"

Many animals answered that it was about good marks, wealth, or fame.

Then the Turtle said: "True education is not only about getting good marks. True education helps us become kind and loving."

The classroom became very quiet. Then all the animals clapped happily for the Turtle.

The gentle Squirrel Teacher smiled and said: "Education becomes successful when we become kinder and more loving."

The Rabbit also began to think about his behavior. From that day, he tried to be not only smart, but also kinder to others.

Question and Heartwork: What is more important: only good marks, or also becoming a kind and loving person?
